

ELEPHANTS AS TIMBER CAR- RIERS.

One of the great industries of Burma is the timber trade. The teak wood, which is the timber cut and shipped, is very heavy, and requires prodigious forces to handle it; and as the Burmese are not far enough advanced to use machinery for the purpose, they employ elephants, and bravely do the noble beasts perform their task. In the timber yards both at Ragoon and at Moulmain, all the heavy work of drawing and piling the logs is done by them. I have never seen animals showing such intelligence and trained to such docility and obedience. In the yard that we visited there were seven elephants, five of which were at that moment at work. Their wonderful strength came into play in moving huge pieces of timber. I did not measure the logs, but should think that many were at least twenty feet long and a foot square. Yet a male elephant would stoop down, and run his tusks under a log and throw his trunk over it, and walk off with it as lightly as a gentleman would balance his bamboo cane on the tip of his finger. Placing it on the pile, he would measure it with his eye, and if it projected too far at either end, would walk up to it, and with a gentle push or pull, make it pile even.

If a still heavier log needed to be moved on the ground to some part of the yard, the mahout, sitting on the elephant's head, would tell him what to do, and the great creature seemed to have a perfect understanding of his master's will. He would put out his enormous foot, and push it along, or he would bend his head, and crouching half way to the ground, and doubling up his trunk in front, throw his whole weight against it and thus, like a ram, "butt" the log into its place, or if it needed to be taken a greater distance, he would put a chain around it and drag it off behind him. The female elephant especially was employed in drawing, as having no tusks, she could not lift like her big brothers, but could only move by her power of traction or attraction. Then using her trunk as deftly as a lady would use her fingers, she would untie the knot or unhitch the chain, and return to her master, perhaps putting out her trunk to receive a banana as a reward for her good conduct. It was a pretty sight, and gave us a new idea of the value of those noble creatures, and of the way in which they can be trained for the service of man.

Before the big fire in the wood yard of Yerington, Bliss & Co., near Carson, was extinguished, from 10,000 to 12,000 cords of wood were consumed. The loss is estimated at from $80,000 to $90,000.
